

32 Texas Groups Urge Budget Conference Committee to Include Bedrock Child Care Funding in State Budget

So far, the Texas Legislature has not committed to providing the funding needed to keep high-quality child care open so parents can go to work.

Over the past two years, the child care situation has gone from bad to worse. As more child care providers close and classrooms sit empty due to a lack of teachers, some parents cannot work, and businesses throughout the economy cannot hire and retain employees.

- A challenge for working families: Parents often have very few choices for high-quality child care — and the available options pose a huge financial burden.
- A challenge for children’s future success in school: Many children — especially from families with fewer resources — end up in lower quality child care during the critical early years of brain development.
- A challenge for underpaid child care educators: In Texas, the median wage of a child care educator is only $12 per hour and with little to no benefits — prompting educators to leave the profession in droves.
- A challenge for child care providers: With parents paying more than they can afford, staff who are leaving due to low pay, and programs barely able to stay afloat, Texas has 27 percent fewer child care programs operating in 2023 than in 2020, according to HHSC Licensing data.
- A challenge for businesses in all sectors of the Texas economy: Texas businesses lose an average of $11.4 billion annually due to insufficient child care, according to an analysis by Ready Nation.

In the absence of legislative action, the crisis is about to get worse: According to a recent survey from the Texas Association for the Education of Young Children, 44 percent of responding child care programs indicated their program is likely or maybe likely to close within the next year when federal relief funding expires.

We urge the Conference Committee to support the proposed rider in Article XI to continue the state’s successful stabilization grants to provide bedrock funding to approximately 13,000 child care providers and over 90,000 Texas early educators. Many other states, including Louisiana and New Mexico, supplement federal funding with additional state funding (beyond required match spending). Texas needs to do the same to ensure working Texans have safe, reliable, high-quality child care for their kids.
